Caroline Devany working at Stone's Throw Urban Farm with some growing sites in the Frogtown (St. Paul) and Phillips (Minneapolis) neighborhoods presented her case (via phone) to FNC members for comment and support. Winners of the Knight Greenline Challenge their project description reads:

To transform space in Green Line neighborhoods into a beautiful anchor farm, Stone's Throw Urban Farm will expand the site to include a year-round greenhouse, two hoop houses and pedestrian-friendly gathering spaces. The site will serve as a hub and host to innovative urban agriculture focused on reinserting food production into the city. The farm will showcase the economic viability of farming in the city and promote economic activity along the Green Line.

Caroline explained some current challenges they are now facing related to extended lease and the tenure of land. Caroline and her team are meeting with City Staffers this week to negotiate an extended lease and work to leverage support for this project. FNC members would like to stay involved if this can be a larger community conversation around land access and permanence issues. Caroline has agreed to attend the December FNC meeting with an update on progress.

Introductions of attendees occurred after this phone conversation. A few additions to the announcements and events were added to the agenda, however, the order of this agenda point was moved to allow Midway Nest project to present next in the interest of their time.

Kate Mudge and Daniel Gerdes presented a summary of their work so far called the Midway Nest. The project received a planning grant from the Healthy Food, Healthy Lives Institute. The Midway Nest was described as a place for start-up food entrepreneurs, with an incubator kitchen, possibly a greenhouse, and a tool lending library. The Midway Nest staff conducted 4 focus groups in the Midway neighborhood asking residents questions about entrepreneurial opportunities related to food along with questions about what are healthy foods and what are the barriers to accessing healthier food items. Surveys were also sent out to a variety of people within the Twin Cities asking similar questions. Next steps include analyze for potential location for the Midway Nest (needing industrial zoned space) and creation of a business plan/funding sources for this project. The presenters also discuss their plans to hold an Open House and present the survey results back to the community members who provided the responses.
